deal goes through.

"The average teen or tween using TikTok will not know the difference," Ives said.

The stakes would be high for Oracle. For its legions of users, TikTok isn't just flashy entertainment, it's a vibrant community, Williamson says. "If anything were to change about that experience as a result of Oracle's involvement, they would be devastated," she said.

Analysts say Oracle will need to make sure that the service retains its hold on operations, but ByteDance would not part with its secret sauce, the technology that suggests videos to users. China had warned it might block the technology from being exported.

So Oracle struck a deal to be ByteDance's U.S. technology partner, meaning it will provide back-end technology to TikTok and assuage the Trump administration's concerns about the security of U.S. users' data, Ives said.

Walmart on Sunday said it is continuing discussions "with ByteDance
